

red pepper

SUBSCRIBE NOW FOR JUST £20
and get our three most recent back issues FREE

About us Get involved Subscribe Latest print issue

READ MORE ON... ACTIVISM | CLIMATE | CUTS | DEMOCRACY | ECONOMICS | FEMINISM | HEALTH | EUROPE | LATIN AMERICA | AFRICA | ASIA | PALESTINE | BOOKS | FILM | ART | EVEN MORE

The construction of (un)reality

James O'Nions reviews a compelling piece of invented history at the Yorkshire Sculpture Park

Greenwich Degree Zero

Rod Dickinson and Tom McCarthy

Longside Gallery, Yorkshire Sculpture Park

The premise of Greenwich Degree Zero is a piece of counterfactual history. In 1894 Martial Bourdin, a French anarchist, explodes a pipe bomb at the Royal Observatory, Greenwich (zero degrees longitude), setting off a fire that destroys the building. The mainstream press reacts with fury, and the police raid an anarchist association, the Autonomie Club, just off Tottenham Court Road. The anarchist press, meanwhile, defends the act as a blow struck for the liberty of workers and against the British Empire.

A little of this tale is true. Bourdin did indeed set off a bomb near the Royal Observatory, though he seems to have done so accidentally, and with little damage to anyone but himself. Since he was killed in the blast, no-one discovered his exact motivation, nor even if the Royal Observatory was his target. As the point from which all time in the British Empire was measured, it could well have been a highly symbolic target for Bourdin's attempted propaganda of the deed. However, at the time some on the left also speculated that Bourdin was encouraged in his act by an agent provocateur seeking to help the passage of Lord Salisbury's Aliens Bill through parliament through a 'outrage' committed by a foreign radical.

Regardless of the likelihood of this conspiracy theory, the incident itself was quickly forgotten until artist Rod Dickinson and author Tom McCarthy rescued it from obscurity to create this fascinating piece of art. Consisting largely of newspapers (from the Pall Mall Gazette to Commonweal: the revolutionary journal of anarchist communism), which have been doctored and reset, the installation also features invented police telegrams, Bourdin's membership card of the Autonomie Club, a reconstruction bomb and other ephemera, along with a primitive Victorian-style film of the Observatory burning down.

James O'Nions
September 2010

MORE ON ART »

The ladder of escape Michael Calderbank considers utopian dreaming and political engagement in the Joan Miró exhibition at Tate Modern

AgiTate The performances of art activists Liberate Tate are celebrated in a new postcard collection.

Banners high Peter Lazenby reviews an exhibition of the work of Britain's most important trade union banner maker

MORE ON CULTURE »

The pursuit of the good Peter McMyler considers Alasdair MacIntyre's classic After Virtue: a study in moral theory, first published in 1981

In the revolutionary warm-stream Michael Calderbank reviews Magical Marxism: subversive politics and the Imagination, by Andy Merrifield

Flower power Jan Goodey reviews Seedbombs: going wild with flowers, by Josie Jeffery

LATEST FROM RED PEPPER

Back to Rio

Sue Branford looks at Brazil's unsustainable development – and the potential for a new direction

South Africa: Power to the people Robby Peek tells

Search the site

Red Pepper is a magazine of political rebellion and dissent, influenced by socialism, feminism and green politics. more »

ADS

The UK's leading supplier of Fair Trade products

GET UPDATES

pepperista

Get our email newsletter once a month, with news, offers, updates and competitions.

your email address:

Subscribe

HELP RED PEPPER

Become a Friend of Red Pepper

We are never meant to be duped by the story, not least because its falsity is presented to us before we enter the room. Instead the work asks us to engage with the mass construction of reality through the media, and holds up a mirror to our own time. Fascinating though this aim is, it's the recreation of the milieu of late 19th-century London, with its community of political refugees from Europe, that really holds your attention.

As in a historical novel, you're not always quite sure where the real history ends and the fiction begins, save for in the main narrative of events. But in creating the detail, Dickinson and McCarthy make you want to believe in their conceit, to the point that I left half-believing that the Royal Observatory might indeed have burnt down.

Greenwich Degree Zero was originally created and shown in 2006, and gets this second outing at the Yorkshire Sculpture Park until 10 October. The park itself is famous for its Henry Moore sculptures, but also features site-specific work by Andy Goldsworthy and James Turrell, including the latter's Deer Shelter Skyspace, a place for contemplation created by cutting a perfectly square opening in the roof of an old deer shelter through which to observe the changing sky. Various other sculptors' works scatter the grounds, surrounded by oblivious groups of sheep (see below).

Also showing until February in both the Longside Gallery and the park itself is a major exhibition of the work of David Nash, whose work in wood combines organic and manmade shapes to create a compelling aesthetic.

A slideshow of shots of Greenwich Degree Zero is available at www.rodickinson.net

James O'Nions is co-editor of Red Pepper.

SUBSCRIBE NOW FOR JUST £20
and get our three most recent back issues FREE

SHARE

 Like  Tweet 0

LEAVE A COMMENT

name

email (will not be published)

website

Coal mine power to the people Bobby Lock tells how the struggle for environmental rights is intertwined with the one over access to energy

Organising ourselves Anne-Marie O'Reilly presents a roundtable discussion of grassroots community organisers

Ritz justice A bill going through parliament threatens to make access to justice a right available only to the rich. Jon Robins reports

'War is a racket': Lessons of 9/11 Ross Eventon discusses the shortcomings of media comment on the last decade of US empire

New life in the unions? Red Pepper interviews union leaders Len McCluskey of Unite and Mark Serwotka of PCS

red pepper blog

Eurozone on the brink... fight back!
Europe Against Austerity, 1 October
What does the left say about the eurozone crisis - and do we have a different way out?

This is what Swazi democracy looks like
Protest is escalating in Africa's last absolute monarchy reports Mike Marqusee

Field day for developers
Opposing the deregulation of planning could unite strange bedfellows says Bob Colenutt

Film: Not a very green revolution
Interview with Devinder Sharma and pictures of Punjabi farming communities

Our big fat fairness failure
Yoshka Pundrik on the pending eviction of traveller families at Dale Farm

Help keep Red Pepper afloat with a regular donation

Watch films online
See free trailers and support Red Pepper by streaming the full films:
Cocaine Unwrapped
The War You Don't See